- 1) The main principles are clarity and sensitivity toward the participants.
  - 2) Double negative should be avoided because they tend to be ambiguous.

- 1) It typically focuses on a large number of cases and allows for an in-depth analysis of phenomena.
  - 2) It draws on participant observation, which involves spending time with people in the field, typically less than six months.
  - 3) It does not aim at testing a pre-existing hypothesis; it begins with a broad research problem, but researchers must strive to remain open-minded and non-judgmental.
  - 4) It is quite flexible and allows the use of multiple data acquisition modes, including interviews, historical and content analysis, questionnaires, and inspection of material artifacts.

- 1) After its move from the study of literature to the study of culture, the Polysystem Theory was developed in order to elucidate the dynamics and heterogeneity of culture. The object of study moved from the conditions of texts and text-dependent activities, to the conditions of repertoires of models in society.
  - 2) Within the framework of Polysystem Theory, one of the major achievements of the Russian semioticians was their analysis of literature as a major contributor of 'potential models of life'. They have shown us the way to conceive of the literary activity as a major industry capable of providing tools for both understanding and operating in actual life.
  - 3) Within the framework of Polysystem Theory, a literary system is a dynamic sociocultural structure, in which center and periphery fight over which 'norm' or 'canonized' literature is an evaluative one.
  - 4) Ploysystemic research into 'minor' literature presupposes that translated literature is not 'secondary' per se. On the contrary, it can, under certain circumstances, function as a 'primary' force—that is, supply innovative options. This could happen in three cases: when the polysystem is (i) young, (ii) peripheral or weak, and (iii) when it is in a state of crisis, vacuum or petrification.

42- Which statement is NOT TRUE?

- 1) Non-prescriptive approach to translation evolved as a reaction to normative, synchronic and source system-oriented theoretical frameworks and focused on the process of source text typology and linguistic theories.
- 2) Viewed from the perspective of 'a system of systems', literary traditions form systems, so do genres and so does the single literary work itself, all interrelated and interacting within the entire social order, and conditioning how specific formal elements would function.
- 3) The "non-prescriptive approach to translation" is not descriptive but analytical, based on relational thinking that compels one to consider not the products but the relations between them. In this way translation is seen as part of the general heterogeneity of culture/society, and the question is how it functions in a given context.
- 4) Any research moving beyond DTS should revolve around the question of how "text" functions in a given context. This principle applies not only to translation of texts, but to all procedures and processes involved in cultural transfer, and as such there is no principal difference between transfer of food, furniture, or texts.

43- Which statement is NOT TRUE?

- 1) According to Reiss, the ideal translation would be one in which the aim in the TL is equivalence as regards the conceptual content, linguistic form and communicative function of a SL text. She refers to this kind of translation as integral communicative performance. However, her approach to translation criticism accounts for certain exceptions from the equivalence requirements.
- 2) Vermeer holds the view that change of function and audience is the general case, not the exception, since the target culture audience always differs from the source culture audience, at least with regard to background knowledge, value systems, norms and conventions, etc., which change the function the translated text may have for them.
- 3) According to the Skopos Theory, the translation brief given to the translator by the client or commissioner does not guarantee translation adequacy. This brief, which would delineate the situation (including the addressed audience) for which the translation is required, needs to be very specific in professional life, and it is the translator's task to diligently comply it to find out what it means for the translation of the source text in question.
- 4) Vermeer's Skopos Theory suggests that it is the skopos of the translation process that determines the translator's choice of strategy: either to keep to the source text's form and wording if the translation is supposed to 'document' any one of the source-text features or characteristics, or to make the target text work as a functional communication instrument that takes account of the audience's knowledge presuppositions, their needs and expectations.

- 44- Which research design best fits to prove the existence of a causal relationship?
 1) Survey                      2) Experiment                      3) Observation                      4) Case study

 1) It occurs when an instrument provides measurements which are aligned with those of other valid instruments.
 2) It refers to the fact that every question on a survey instrument is related to the construct of interest.
 3) It is the degree to which a measure provides information about other behaviors, beliefs or qualities, usually in future.
 4) It involves the procedures and measures taken towards practical operationalization of concepts.
